The Process

First Impression

At the beginning of the module, I was wondering if I could in fact pull the project off.

Despite having worked with HTML in the past, it was mostly done for fun. Back then I only knew how to complete a few simple exercises, where I learned the basics, but I hadn't actually had the chance to put them in use.
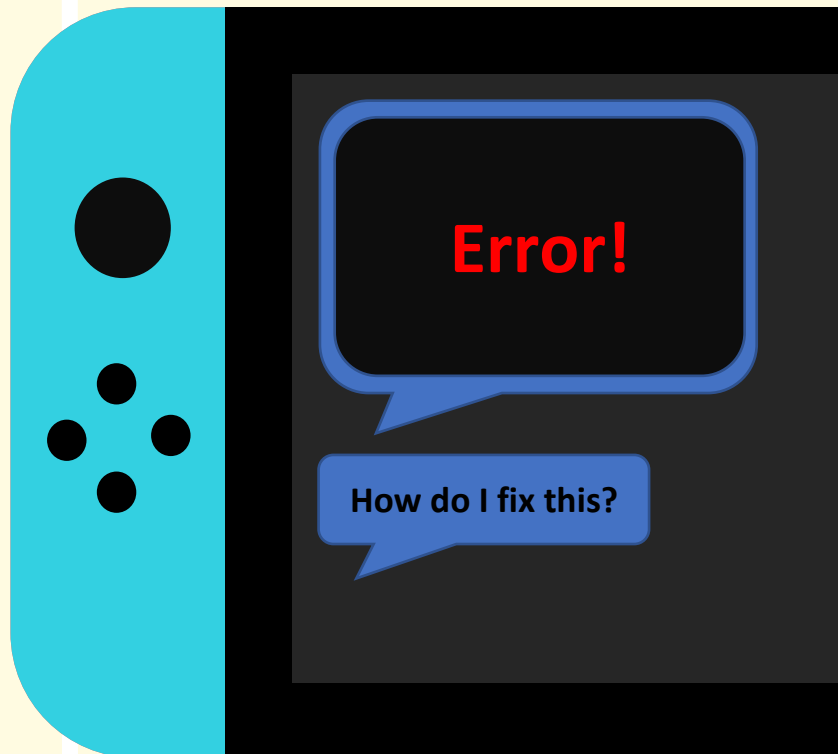

With this module, I was given that exact chance, which made me very excited.

The Confusion

With the help of W3School I was able to learn a lot about HTML, but then CSS came up like the winter wind and hit me in the face with all its might.

I am not going to lie; I was very frustrated until I got better at coding in CSS. It was not all that complicated to do, just a matter of misunderstanding.
The more I used it, the more used I got to it.

The Problems

Design

The first problem I was confronted with was finding the right style for my Website. While it may seem easy to some, it is actually very stressful to find the right look and stick to it.

As a perfectionist I cannot let myself do anything other than the image I have in my head, because once I have found the way my Website should look like, I must do my best to make it look exactly like that, which takes a lot of time and puts a lot of stress on me. Unfortunately, I have yet to find a fix for that problem.

Lack of Concentration

You do not know the true definition of being loud until you meet my family. Each day is like a competition of who can be the loudest and irritate me the most.
Yet another problem I cannot fix.

The Navigation Bar

One of the most annoying things to fix was the Nav bar, as It did not want to align well with the webpage, despite having the same line of code as before.

Finding and fixing the problem proved to be too time wasteful, so eventually I decided to redo it. While it did cost some of my progress, it was a price worth paying, as I got some new ideas.

The Header

After numerous failed attempts at adding a background picture to my Website's header, I simply ended up chosing a background color.

Flexing

The word is funny but it's not funny when you struggle to get the pictures and writing in the right places.

I had to look up some youtube tutorials to figure it out, and eventually I did.

Animations

I had to look up a tutorial for those as well because I didn't want a complete bland Website, it wasn't really that big of a problem to get them in, but at some point I went overboard.

END

Conclusion

This has been one of the most stressful experiences in my whole life. Not only am I 30 minutes away from possibly failing the project by not being able to upload it to GitHub, but I am also exhausted beyond belief.

Planning is very important, I should have done that way sooner before starting with the Website.

Luckily, I was given permission to complete this assignment in English, which helped me a lot, believe it or not.
